Practice. As with the old proverb of the blind men deriving very different descriptions of an elephant by describing disparate parts of the whole, so it goes with the practice of anthropology. Yes, you will find practitioners in remote villages of the world, working with exotic, little-known peoples. They can also be found at ancient excavation sites, piecing together the past to understand the present.

Disaster anthropology relentlessly arrives at the all-too-common problem of “policies and practices need to consider local culture.” Here too culture is framed as static, passive, homogenous. Understanding the complexity and dynamics by which we experience and understand the world is much more challenging than at first glance.
