How To Refer Myself In

There are two ways—and two ways only—that you can refer to yourself as “myself” in a sentence. Both of them involve sentences that also include either “I” or “me.”. In this case, “myself” is an intensive pronoun, added for emphasis. The other correct usage is as a reflexive pronoun, for example when “I” is the subject of the sentence—the actor—and “myself” is the object—the one acted upon.

How to Cite Yourself. Ok, let's say that you have a legitimate reason to cite yourself. Fortunately, that was the hard part. But you should still make a self-citation professional. Make it clear that you're self-citing. Don't make it appear that you're actually citing someone else, or bury your self-citation in the middle of a long group of references; I've seen both of these and it doesn't appear professional.
