Similarly, armed ethnic leaders have sometimes viewed the struggle for democracy as tangential to their own struggles for political autonomy. While many of the ethnic groups living in areas controlled by the central government participated in the 1988 pro-democracy demonstrations, the leaders of the ethnic nationalist armies held their soldiers back, seeing it as an intra-Burman conflict.

SURVIVAL AND REVIVAL OF TIBETAN ETHNIC IDENTITY IN INDIA* Dawa Dolma Department of Political Science, Central European University, Hungary ABSTRACT Ethnic identity is a complex multifaceted phenomenon that is constructed or negotiated to form a nation-state. Once formed, it occupies an intrinsic part of the development of an individual.

SURVIVAL AND REVIVAL OF TIBETAN ETHNIC IDENTITY IN INDIA*

Political scientists and journalists often speak of ethnic politics as if party and ethnic group were coextensive. This is only true in a very crude sense, for competition over resources does split ethnic groups. It is under the guise of party affiliation that old rivalries within and between towns re-emerge in a transformed context.
